1. Objectives

- a. To share good practices in formulating science, technology, and innovation policy (STIP) for tackling societal challenges and enhancing productivity performance; and
- b. To discuss effective mechanisms of enhancing STIP responsiveness to emergency demand.

2. Background

Scientific breakthroughs, disruptive technologies, and radical innovation have contributed to advances in productivity and economic development. Resources mobilized for science, technology, and innovation (STI) have been aimed mainly at maximizing economic benefits. Recently, the emergence of complex social issues has raised the question of the dominant focus inherent in most countries' STIP frameworks. For example, developing countries have recognized that growth alone does not guarantee equality and inclusiveness, while the higher-income ones still face substantial strains such as care systems for the elderly in "silver economies". The common realization is that even though economic growth and social progress are not mutually exclusive, their targets have not been in tandem in STIP formulation. The ongoing crisis due to the COVID-19 pandemic serves as a typical illustration of the urgency of broadening STI agendas to anticipate and respond to social problems.

Reflecting the fact that social dimensions are no longer peripheral to but a crucial factor in driving STI policymaking and shaping its outcomes, there is growing demand to evolve STIP frameworks to tackle social challenges while pursuing economic growth-promoting objectives. This expanded scope implies that policymakers need to use multiple frameworks to achieve diverse economic and social outcomes. Initiatives aiming at a more sustainable, prosperous future through STIP are being launched worldwide. Many governments have started putting in place various STIP instruments including research grants to address social challenges, funding schemes for social innovation projects, and prizes in recognition of social efforts. Another aim is enlarging the group of social innovators. Through the whole-of-government approach, plans to shift from technology-centered to human-centered STI or to mainstream SDG inclusiveness targets into national STI strategies are other examples.

This conference organized by the APO will be a good platform to share the best practices in designing and reframing STIP targeting both social and economic progress issues. Discussions of mechanisms to facilitate swift responses to societal emergencies like pandemics, enhance STIP responsiveness to social demands for inclusiveness and equality, etc. will be the key focus of this conference. The conference is a continuation of APO efforts to promote simultaneous innovation-led productivity growth and greater social inclusiveness.

3. Modality of Implementation

- a. This conference will be conducted online using videoconference applications.
- b. The resource speakers and participants will participate in the session virtually using their own devices, applications, and Internet connections.
